Myself: Chill out, don't be so mad (even under the hood) when facing a tough bug or an annoying feature that doesn't quite work as intended. When leading discussions or things don't be so uptight.

Jessica: Holy shit girl. You did so much work. From bossing the front end and making my UI ideas come to life, to making all the middleware work, to hosting on heroku-you are a super hero. As hard as it is when you are as awesome as you are, I think you should try to kinda peddle off some of the parts of the project you're working on when you are already contributing a ton to the overall project. Though maybe you didn't have a ton of other work to do this semester-in which case more power to you :)

Hyungie: Working with you was a pleasure. You kept your wits about you when we were facing incredibly frustrating bugs together. Even though I was exasperated you never let it get to you and that is commendable. Also, when you had problems, you asked for help and I find that really attractive in a project partner :D. You handled invites and sessions beautifully and always advocated for more organized code with better separation of concerns.

Carolyn: At the beginning of the process I really enjoyed having you in the group and as we were working on design you made a great contribution. You started up the code when I was too lazy to write the first version :p. Unfortunately later in the project you had other projects that you were sometimes more focused on. It's all right and expected to have other projects but you have to communicate with the rest of your team about it so they/we know what to expect. You had a great can-do attitude when it came to a lot of challenging problems when we were all pretty negative about them and that's great but just take your teams opinions into account when you estimate how much time something will take. Good working with you :)
